New meaning for having your cake and eating it too

Love the one you're with. Or don't. Really, it's your call.

If you're one of those people who's happily in a committed relationship, well then good for you. Everyone else out there is either lonely or bored, or both, and for those people, Valentine's Day can really bite.

If you're in the lonely camp, might we suggest making a stop at Carle Place-based LL Dent on Tuesday? The Southern-style cookery will be featuring a prix fixe menu along with live commentary from national relationship experts. Not only will you be fed and have a chance to meet some other singles who may be in attendance, but you'll probably get some good advice as to why your previous relationships haven't been working out. Here's a tip: Text messaging someone 50 times the morning after going on a date probably isn't going to get you another date.

Then there's those who are bored – the ones who already have someone, but wish they had someone else. These are the people who celebrate Feb. 13, or as it's known by its less common name, Mistress Day – the day straying boyfriends and husbands set aside for the "other woman."

We're serious.

Looking for someone on the side without all of the hassle of having the old lady find out? You might be interested in SugarSugar.com, a website that matches "sugar daddies" with "sugar babies" via its "sugar daddy concierge" service.

For those of you who do actually use this service to celebrate Mistress Day, our only advice is to be extremely careful or you may end up needing to read from our "lonely" section above.
